The tuner's ear

Five moments from a working life spent listening.

A My father tuned pianos for a living, and for most of my childhood I regarded his work as the dullest occupation a grown man could have chosen. On Saturdays he took me with him, and I would sit in strangers' front rooms while he played the same note, over and over, for what felt like hours. I was not allowed to speak. I counted the patterns in carpets, the books on shelves, the photographs of other people's weddings. My father never asked whether I wanted to come; I think he simply could not imagine a Saturday spent any other way. Once, in a house near the canal, an elderly woman gave me a slice of cake and told me that I would be a tuner too one day. I informed her, with all the confidence of nine, that I would sooner sweep chimneys. She laughed and said that was exactly what her son had said about the law. He had been a judge for twenty years.

B I was seventeen, and had failed most of my examinations, when I went to work for Arthur Pell, who had trained my father and who believed that praise was best kept for the dead. Pell spoke perhaps twenty words a day, most of them to the pianos. For the first six months he would not let me near an instrument. I sorted felts, cleaned tools and listened. His theory was that the ear had to be taught to be dissatisfied before it could be taught anything else, and I resented him for it with the full force of a teenager who had expected to be useful. At the time I counted the days until I could leave, and told anyone who would listen that the old man was wasting my time. It was years before I understood that he had given me the most valuable thing I own.

C My first engagement at the City Hall came about by accident: the regular tuner had broken his wrist, and I was the only person anyone could find at short notice. The soloist that evening was a celebrated pianist with a reputation for sending tuners home in tears, and I spent the afternoon fully expecting to be one of them. I tuned the piano three times before the doors opened, each time convinced that I had made it worse. He arrived during the last half-hour, played a single scale and asked me to come to the green room at the interval. I assumed the worst. Instead, he wanted to know who had taught me, and when I told him, he nodded as if that explained something. I have tuned for him a dozen times since, and he has never once mentioned that first evening. Neither have I.

D The worst mistake of my working life was made in a village hall in Norfolk, on a piano that deserved better than me. I was tired and already late for another appointment, and I left a single string slightly flat, telling myself that nobody at a school concert would notice. Somebody did: a girl of about eleven, who stopped in the middle of her piece, looked at the keyboard and then, very deliberately, at me. Her teacher, mortified, began to apologise on her behalf. I have thought about that girl more often than about any concert pianist I have worked for. I went back the following week, unasked and unpaid, and retuned the whole instrument. It undid nothing, of course, but I have never since walked away from a job that I knew to be unfinished.

E Most tuners now carry an electronic device that listens to each note and shows, with a needle or a row of lights, how far it is from true. I resisted them for years, partly out of loyalty to Pell and partly, I suspect, out of vanity. I use one now, and I am glad of it: my hearing is not what it was, and the machine does not tire at the end of a long day. What it cannot do is decide when a piano should be left slightly imperfect because that particular instrument, in that particular room, sounds better for it. That judgement is still the tuner's, and I am not sure the young people I train believe me when I say so. They are polite about it, as I was not about Pell, but I can see them glancing at the lights.

Explicación por pregunta

44 · E

Pregunta: In which extract does the writer give a practical reason for embracing something they had held out against?

Elementos (2), cada uno con su línea:

1. Resistencia larga: I resisted them for years.
2. Razón práctica para adoptarlo: I use one now, and I am glad of it; my hearing is not what it was, and the machine does not tire at the end of a long day.

Tentadora: B (pasaje vecino, RDG-P5 §7.8). También acepta tarde algo que rechazaba (It was years before I understood that he had given me the most valuable thing I own), pero es el método de un maestro, no algo que adopte, y no da ninguna razón práctica. Es la respuesta de la 48.

Teoría: §4.1 Preguntas de uno y de dos elementos · §3.4 Señales de postura y de cambio

45 · C

Pregunta: In which extract does the writer describe a fear that proved unfounded?

Elementos (2), cada uno con su línea:

1. Miedo: I spent the afternoon fully expecting to be one of them; I assumed the worst.
2. Sin fundamento: Instead, he wanted to know who had taught me.

Tentadora: D (medio cierto, RDG-P5 §7.6). Hay una suposición que resultó falsa (telling myself that nobody at a school concert would notice), pero no era un miedo, sino lo contrario: un exceso de confianza.

Teoría: §4.1 Preguntas de uno y de dos elementos · §3.3 Prever la paráfrasis

46 · A

Pregunta: In which extract does the writer recall an unflattering early opinion of a parent's trade?

En el texto: for most of my childhood I regarded his work as the dullest occupation a grown man could have chosen.

Tentadora: B (eco léxico, RDG-P5 §7.1). Aparece el padre (Arthur Pell, who had trained my father), pero lo que le pesa es su propio aprendizaje a los diecisiete años (I counted the days until I could leave), no una opinión infantil sobre el oficio del padre.

Teoría: §5.3 Extractos de un mismo texto · §3.3 Prever la paráfrasis

47 · D

Pregunta: In which extract does the writer own up to a lapse that permanently changed their professional habits?

Elementos (2), cada uno con su línea:

1. Descuido reconocido: I left a single string slightly flat, sabiéndolo (telling myself that nobody at a school concert would notice).
2. Cambio duradero: I have never since walked away from a job that I knew to be unfinished.

Tentadora: E (medio cierto, RDG-P5 §7.6). También cambia su forma de trabajar (I use one now), pero por la edad, no a raíz de un descuido propio.

Teoría: §4.1 Preguntas de uno y de dos elementos · §5.3 Extractos de un mismo texto

48 · B

Pregunta: In which extract does the writer acknowledge a debt to someone whose methods once infuriated them?

Elementos (2), cada uno con su línea:

1. Rechazo entonces: I resented him for it with the full force of a teenager.
2. Deuda reconocida ahora: he had given me the most valuable thing I own.

Tentadora: E (pasaje vecino, RDG-P5 §7.8). Resistencia y aceptación tardía (I resisted them for years), pero de un aparato, no de los métodos de una persona; y la lealtad a Pell (partly out of loyalty to Pell) no es una deuda que reconozca tras haberle guardado rencor. Es la respuesta de la 44.

Teoría: §5.3 Extractos de un mismo texto · §3.4 Señales de postura y de cambio

49 · E

Pregunta: In which extract does the writer doubt whether those they teach accept a point they make?

En el texto: I am not sure the young people I train believe me when I say so; I can see them glancing at the lights.

Tentadora: B (voz, RDG-P5 §7.4). Hay un alumno que no acepta lo que le enseñan (told anyone who would listen that the old man was wasting my time), pero el alumno es el autor; quien enseñaba era Pell.

Teoría: §4.2 Lo que se pierde al comprobar · §3.3 Prever la paráfrasis

50 · A

Pregunta: In which extract does the writer recall dismissing a prediction about their own future?

Elementos (2), cada uno con su línea:

1. Predicción: told me that I would be a tuner too one day.
2. La descarta: I would sooner sweep chimneys.

Tentadora: E (voz, RDG-P5 §7.4). Alguien no se cree lo que le dicen (I am not sure the young people I train believe me), pero son sus alumnos, y no se trata de una predicción sobre el futuro del autor.

Teoría: §4.1 Preguntas de uno y de dos elementos · §5.3 Extractos de un mismo texto

51 · C

Pregunta: In which extract does the writer mention an episode that both parties have chosen not to refer to?

En el texto: he has never once mentioned that first evening. Neither have I.

Tentadora: D (ausente, RDG-P5 §7.7). Hay una comunicación sin palabras (looked at the keyboard and then, very deliberately, at me), pero nada indica que los dos hayan decidido no volver a hablar del asunto.

Teoría: §3.3 Prever la paráfrasis · §4.3 La sección tentadora

52 · D

Pregunta: In which extract does the writer say that a child made a deeper impression on them than celebrated musicians?

Elementos (2), cada uno con su línea:

1. El niño: a girl of about eleven.
2. Más que los famosos: I have thought about that girl more often than about any concert pianist I have worked for.

Tentadora: C (medio cierto, RDG-P5 §7.6). Hay un pianista famoso (a celebrated pianist with a reputation for sending tuners home in tears) y una relación duradera, pero ningún niño ni ninguna comparación.

Teoría: §4.1 Preguntas de uno y de dos elementos · §4.3 La sección tentadora

53 · B

Pregunta: In which extract does the writer refer to a belief about what must come first in acquiring a skill?

En el texto: His theory was that the ear had to be taught to be dissatisfied before it could be taught anything else.

Tentadora: E (no responde, RDG-P5 §7.2). Expresa una convicción sobre el oficio (That judgement is still the tuner's), pero sobre quién decide, no sobre el orden en que se aprende.

Teoría: §3.3 Prever la paráfrasis · §4.3 La sección tentadora
