Extract One

You hear an economist talking about how people judge risk.

Voces · Economist: Connor, inglés irlandés

> Ask people whether they'd rather fly or drive across the country, and a surprising number will tell you, quite seriously, that driving feels safer. Statistically, of course, it isn't – not remotely. But I've stopped thinking of that as simple ignorance. Most people know the figures perfectly well. What they're responding to is control[2]. Behind the wheel, you're the one making the decisions; on a plane, you've handed your life over to strangers. My grandmother wouldn't set foot in an aeroplane, yet she drove the coast road home every Sunday night for forty years, through fog, with one headlight that worked when it felt like it. She'd have told you she was a careful driver, and she was. That's precisely the point. Feeling in charge is a powerful anaesthetic[1]. So if you're trying to change how people behave, throwing statistics at them rarely works. You have to give them something to do.

1 · C · Función

Pregunta: What is the economist doing when he talks about his grandmother?

A showing that careful drivers are much less likely to be involved in accidents
Falla (eco léxico §4.1). Recoge a careful driver, pero la anécdota dice lo contrario: conducir con cuidado no quitaba el peligro de la niebla y del faro.

B suggesting that older people are worse at judging risk than others
Falla (ausente §4.8). Habla de una persona concreta para ilustrar algo que atribuye a Most people. No compara edades.

C illustrating how a sense of control can make real danger seem acceptable
Correcta. La idea es What they're responding to is control. La abuela, que no subía a un avión pero conducía con niebla y un solo faro, es el ejemplo, y él mismo lo remata: That's precisely the point. Feeling in charge is a powerful anaesthetic. La anestesia es lo que hace soportable el peligro.

Teoría: §3.5 Función y propósito · §5.3 Part 1: tipos de pregunta

2 · B · Actitud y opinión

Pregunta: What does he suggest about people who prefer driving to flying?

A They are unaware of how dangerous driving really is.
Falla (voz equivocada §4.4). Es lo que él pensaba antes y ya no piensa: I've stopped thinking of that as simple ignorance. Most people know the figures perfectly well.

B Their preference reflects a need to feel in control.
Correcta. What they're responding to is control: al volante decide uno mismo (you're the one making the decisions).

C They could be persuaded by clearer evidence.
Falla (mencionado y descartado §4.2). Lo descarta al final: throwing statistics at them rarely works.

Teoría: §3.2 Voz propia y voces ajenas · §3.1 Lo que se dice y lo que se da a entender

Extract Two

You hear two friends talking about a play they have just seen.

Voces · Woman: Sonia, inglés británico · Man: Ryan, inglés británico

Woman	So, was it worth missing the football for?
Man	Honestly? I'd braced myself for three hours of people in tights shouting at each other, and it was nothing of the sort[3]. They'd cut it right down. I don't think it ran much over ninety minutes.
Woman	That's what bothered me, actually. They dropped the whole subplot with the two brothers, and without it the ending doesn't quite make sense[4]. Why does the father forgive her? In the full play you've watched him lose everything. Here he just changes his mind.
Man	I've never read it, so I didn't notice. Though now you mention it, the last scene did feel a bit sudden.
Woman	And it's a shame, because the actress playing the daughter was superb. I've seen that part done a dozen times, and she found things in it I'd never noticed.
Man	Well, she's the reason I'd go again. Sudden ending or not.

3 · A · Propósito

Pregunta: Why does the man mention 'people in tights shouting at each other'?

A to describe what he had expected the evening to be like
Correcta. I'd braced myself for presenta lo que temía encontrar, y it was nothing of the sort lo contrasta con lo que vio. La mención sirve para describir su expectativa.

B to criticise the way the play had been staged
Falla (expectativa §4.7). Era lo que temía, no lo que vio: it was nothing of the sort.

C to explain why he had almost decided not to go
Falla (ausente §4.8). Nunca dice que estuviera a punto de no ir. braced myself for indica que se preparaba para algo pesado, no que dudara.

Teoría: §3.5 Función y propósito · §3.3 La segunda idea manda

4 · B · Actitud y opinión

Pregunta: What is the woman's main criticism of the production?

A The actress playing the daughter had been badly miscast.
Falla (eco léxico §4.1). Recoge the actress playing the daughter, pero para elogiarla: was superb.

B Shortening the play made the ending unconvincing.
Correcta. Responde a They'd cut it right down con That's what bothered me: al quitar la subtrama, without it the ending doesn't quite make sense.

C It was too traditional in its approach.
Falla (ausente §4.8). Nadie dice que fuera tradicional; lo único que se sugiere es que estaba muy recortada.

Extract Three

You hear a translator talking about her work.

Voces · Translator: Libby, inglés británico

> People love asking translators about so-called untranslatable words – the Danish one for a particular kind of cosiness, say – as if our job were a treasure hunt for exotic vocabulary. Honestly, those are the easy cases[5]. You add a footnote, or you borrow the word, and readers rather enjoy it. What keeps me awake is something far more ordinary, and that's tone. A Spanish novelist can be warm and formal in the same sentence in a way that, put into English, comes out either stiff or overfamiliar. There's no footnote for that, and no dictionary will help you either. You make a hundred small decisions on every page, and if you get them right, nobody notices – which is exactly as it should be. The compliment I value most isn't 'beautifully translated'. It's when a reader tells me they forgot they were reading a translation at all[6].

5 · C · Propósito

Pregunta: Why does the translator mention so-called untranslatable words?

A to explain why translations often need footnotes
Falla (no responde §4.3). La nota a pie es su solución para esos casos (You add a footnote), no la razón por la que los menciona.

B to show how much readers tend to enjoy discovering unfamiliar vocabulary
Falla (no responde §4.3). Es verdad que readers rather enjoy it, pero es un detalle de paso, no la función de la mención.

C to suggest that they are less of a problem than people think
Correcta. Las presenta como lo que interesa a la gente (People love asking translators) y enseguida les quita importancia: Honestly, those are the easy cases. Además, so-called ya marca distancia (§3.2).

Teoría: §3.5 Función y propósito · §3.2 Voz propia y voces ajenas

6 · A · Actitud y opinión

Pregunta: What does she say about praise for her work?

A She is most pleased when readers are unaware of her contribution.
Correcta. The compliment I value most es que el lector olvide que lee una traducción: they forgot they were reading a translation at all. Su trabajo pasa inadvertido, y eso es lo que quiere.

B She distrusts compliments about the elegance of her style.
Falla (grado y alcance §4.5). Solo dice que valora más otro elogio (The compliment I value most isn't 'beautifully translated'); no que desconfíe de ese.

C She seldom receives any recognition from readers.
Falla (eco léxico §4.1). nobody notices se refiere a las decisiones bien tomadas, no a la falta de reconocimiento.
